Dravot and Carnehan are both experienced soldiers, and they are confident that they can succeed in their conquest of Kafiristan. They have heard stories of the region's vast wealth and natural resources, and they are eager to claim it for themselves. However, they soon discover that Kafiristan is not as easy to conquer as they had imagined.

The people of Kafiristan are a fierce and independent people, and they are not willing to submit to foreign rule. Dravot and Carnehan are forced to fight for every inch of territory they gain, and they soon realize that they are in over their heads. Despite the challenges they face, Dravot and Carnehan refuse to give up. They are determined to succeed in their quest, and they are willing to pay any price to achieve their goals.

The Characters

The Man Who Would Be King features a cast of colorful and memorable characters. Dravot and Carnehan are the central characters, and they are both complex and fascinating individuals. Dravot is a charismatic and ambitious leader, while Carnehan is a loyal and devoted friend. Together, they form a formidable team, and they are willing to go to any lengths to achieve their goals.

In addition to Dravot and Carnehan, The Man Who Would Be King also features a number of other memorable characters. These include:

- Billy Fish, a Cockney adventurer who joins Dravot and Carnehan on their quest
- Gunga Din, a loyal Indian servant who sacrifices his life to save Dravot and Carnehan
- The priest of Kafiristan, a mysterious and powerful figure who plays a key role in the novel's climax

The Themes

The Man Who Would Be King is a complex and multi-layered novel. It explores a number of themes, including:

- The nature of imperialism
